

FRANTS ALEKSEEVICH RUBO (ROUBAUD)

(Odessa 1856 - Munich 1928)

Lone Cossack Horseman

signed and dated 'F Roubaud/93' (lower right)

oil on board

18 x 13.5 cm (7 x 5¼ in)

Literature: E.Lingenauber and O.Sugrobova-Roth, Franz Roubaud. Catalogue raisonné, Dusseldorf: Edition Libertars, 2012, p.154, no.261 illustrated.

THIS POIGNANT AND EVOCATIVE PAINTING SHOWS a centrally positioned Cossack horseman facing directly towards the viewer, as if formally posing for his portrait. In his right hand he holds a long staff whilst he grips the reins of the horse with the other, a weapon tucked neatly into his tunic, showing a proud and commanding stance. Frants Alekseevich Rubo chooses to focus entirely on the horseman and leaves the surrounding landscape unfinished with sketchy brushstrokes, whilst the features of the horse and rider are finer and more detailed. The weather-beaten face of the rider suggests a lifetime of hard commitment, while the horse appears weary, his head bowed in rest.

The rider wears a blue tunic with yellow shoulder straps, possibly identifying him as an Astrakhan Cossack. The Astrakhan Cossacks were established in 1750 to patrol the lower banks of the Volga from Astrakhan to Cherniy Yar. Astrakhan lies on the Volga River in southern Russia and the city is the administrative centre of Astrakhan Oblast, a federal subject or oblast of Russia. Astrakhan Cossacks such as the one in Lone Cossack Horseman took part in both the Patriotic War of 1812 and the Russo-Turkish conflicts throughout the nineteenth century. They were frequently portrayed in paintings to epitomise the successes of Russian Imperialism on her closest frontiers.

The Cossack horses, though smaller than their regular cavalry counterparts, were frequently used by the regular cavalry due to their robustness. The saddle was attached to the horses back by two large girths and the Cossacks' possessions were stored in the saddle bag. However, the harness had no bit, thereby allowing the horse to eat whenever it wanted to.

Rubo was born in Odessa in 1856. At the age of twenty one he moved to Munich to study under the genre painters Carl von Piloty (1826-1886) and Otto Seitz (1846-1912). In 1881, after having travelled to Paris and the South of France, Rubo began his studies at a private school run by the famous Polish battle painter Josef von Brandt (1841-1915). Von Brandt particularly favoured historical Cossack subject-matter, and no doubt this made a lasting impression on the young Rubo (fig. 1).

Josef von Brandt, Cossack on Duty,
Private Collection (Figure 1)

Only two years later Rubo received a commission from the Russian government to travel through the Caucasus and in 1885 he executed a series of history paintings for the Hall of Fame in Tiflis. It was during this period working in the Caucasus that Rubo would have completed Lone Cossack Horseman. Besides monumental history paintings, Rubo also produced a number of works depicting the people of the Caucasus region hunting, fighting and travelling. In 1913 he left Russia for Munich, where he died on 13 March, 1928.

F. R. Baird
93